

You see the verdict. You see the courtroom. You see the outcome.

But what you don't see is everything that leads up to it—the late nights, the quiet conversations, the moments where someone just needs to be heard.

This work isn't about big speeches or dramatic moments. In fact, it rarely is.

It's about taking the time to sit with someone while they try to make sense of what just happened to them. It's doing what you said you'd do, no matter how long it takes.

Because behind every case is a real person, a real family, and a real situation that matters.

That's the part of the job most people don't see.

But it's the part that matters most.

Take care,

Mason
