

Before I ever set foot in a courtroom, something else was being built first.

A foundation.

One that had nothing to do with the law and everything to do with how you treat people.

Over the years, I've learned that success without integrity doesn't mean much. That doing the right thing isn't always the easiest path, but it's the only path that's worth taking.

I don't always get it right, but I try to approach my work with the same mindset every day.

Treat people with dignity, be honest, even when it's difficult (especially when it's difficult), and do what's right, not what's convenient.

Because, when all is said and done, the work we do isn't about outcomes.

It's about people.

Take care,

Mason
