

After an accident, most people do the same thing.

They wait.

They wait to see if the pain goes away. They wait to see if the insurance company will “do the right thing.” They wait until things feel serious enough to ask for help.

Here’s the hard truth: By the time they make that call, they’re already behind.

I understand that hesitation. No one wants to overreact. No one wants to make a situation bigger than it needs to be.

But I want to let you know what I’ve learned over the years.

Making that call and getting answers will never make things worse. It’s going to give you clarity. You may have a strong case, you may not. But, either way, you’re not guessing anymore.

If you, or someone you know, has been in an accident and isn’t sure what to do next, I’m always happy to have that conversation.

That first call can be frightening. But, once we talk, I promise you’ll know exactly where you stand.
