

Recently, we had the opportunity to do something simple that meant a lot to us.

We donated more than 100 baseballs to the Berkeley High School baseball program. A simple gesture, really. Just a bunch of baseballs.

But, around here, simple gestures can go a long, long way.

It means the kids have what they need to practice. It means that teams can focus on playing the game instead of worrying about equipment. And it means a small piece of the community coming together to support the next generation.

As a lifelong fan of the game, I have always believed that what we do off the field matters just as much as what we do on the field.

The lessons learned in the game—showing up, working hard, being part of a team—stick with you long after the last out has been called.

That's a big part of what we do at West Law Firm. We show up for people. We support our community. And we invest in the small things that, over time, make a big difference.

If you ever need someone in your corner, reach out. I'm always here.

Take care,

Mason
