

Over the years, I've noticed something. The words of advice that resonate the strongest aren't usually delivered in a drawn-out proclamation or monologue. They're usually made up of just a few words.

Show up. Keep your word. Treat people with respect.

These aren't just good life principles. They're good principles for business, too.

I've been fortunate enough to have had people in my life who have lived out those principles, both in business and in life, and their example shaped me more than I could ever really explain.

The truth is, whether we're raising children, serving clients, or just trying to be good neighbors, people tend to remember what we do a lot more than what we say.

Take care,

Mason
